What Page Are You On?
Written Solutions to Unwritten Problems

Have you ever had interactions with colleagues or students and wondered "What page are they ON?"? Conflict can arise when people come to a situation with different understandings, values, and expectations.

From students using laptops in class to dissertation committee dust-ups to promotion and tenure criteria, writing down common and shared understandings, values and expectations may help prevent or lessen conflict in the future. This workshop will focus on how written documents can contribute to forming and enacting shared expectations.

Presenter: Jay Parkes, Professor of Educational Psychology

Jay Parkes is Professor of Educational Psychology, a former department chair in the College of Education, and a Faculty Representative for Ombuds Services for Faculty. His professional interests include classroom assessment and educational measurement.
